

TREATMENT: THE ALIBI

Eleanor Hayes has spent her life building a reputation, brilliant legal mind, pillar of the community, a seemingly perfect marriage to Jordan, a charming real estate developer. She's poised for a political appointment, admired for her poise, intellect, and composure.

But one morning, Eleanor wakes up to a nightmare: her husband is gone, and a woman she's never seen before is lying dead next to her in their marital bed. No signs of forced entry. No signs of a struggle. No memory of what happened.

Rather than call the police, Eleanor makes a calculated decision, she cleans the scene. Hides the body. Constructs an alibi. She knows how the system works and how quickly it turns on Black women.

She enlists help from her best friend Jasmine, a sharp-tongued crisis PR fixer who agrees to help, though she's not sure if Eleanor is a victim or a suspect. Together, they craft a narrative to protect Eleanor's career, her image, and her freedom.

But secrets don't stay buried.

A series of cryptic text messages begin arriving from an unknown number: "I know what you did."

The stranger's identity is revealed, she was an escort. Her connection to Jordan becomes undeniable.

Surveillance footage surfaces that contradicts Eleanor's timeline.

And the final nail: a security camera shows Eleanor driving away from her house the night before, with the dead woman in her passenger seat.

Is someone framing her? Was Jordan involved in something darker than she knew? Or is Eleanor guilty of more than she remembers?

As the investigation intensifies, Eleanor's carefully constructed reality begins to collapse. Her legal expertise becomes her weapon but also her trap. Her alibi becomes the battleground.

In the final act, Eleanor confronts the truth: Jordan staged the entire thing. He faked his own disappearance and framed her to avoid exposure in a major corruption scandal involving sex trafficking and city contracts. The body was a setup. The camera footage was manipulated.

But Eleanor turns the tables. Using her legal mind and Jordan's arrogance against him, she sets a new trap, one that ends with him caught in the exact same system he thought he controlled.

In a stunning climax, Eleanor delivers a televised press conference not to defend herself but to dismantle the narrative. She admits to cleaning the scene, not because she was guilty but because she was terrified. Her truth becomes her power.

The film ends not with total exoneration but with reclamation. Eleanor doesn't walk away unscathed but she walks away in control of her story.
