

PREMISE

In Singapore's automated future, a covert team hunts threats dismissed by the city's predictive system. Each intervention forces its leader to choose whose life the system can afford to lose.

THE HOOK

A dead man's badge. A valid work order. A threat the system calls safe. Four people notice what the algorithm ignores, and stopping the attack makes them responsible for its consequences.

PILOT: HEADWAY

A dead technician's badge admits an attacker into a rail tunnel. Sarah's team finds a device designed around LATTICE's own emergency playbook. The model projects 37 deaths if they do nothing, so Sarah redirects the fault to a lightly occupied train. An elderly cleaner dies during the evacuation, and Sarah discovers the woman had cleaned her table every morning.

She cleared my table.

SEASON ONE: WHO DECIDES WHAT ACCEPTABLE DAMAGE MEANS?

01 HEADWAY A rail attack. One death fractures the team.

02 PRIORITY Whose hospital care the model postpones.

03 DEAD LOAD A port anomaly behind a clean safety record.

04 WITHIN TOLERANCE The Bedok record ties Sarah to a death.

05 WORK ORDER Ros's trusted access becomes a liability.

06 OBSERVE Who has been steering their interventions?

07 NAMES Darren's ledger connects the accepted losses.

08 THE NECESSARY SIN Sarah confronts the authority behind the forecasts.

THE WORLD

- LATTICE ranks anomalies and models the cost of intervention. A badge outweighs a face. A death falls within tolerance.
- Below the surface, maintenance tunnels and service corridors keep gaps in the digital map.
- Hawker centres and HDB homes give every system failure a human address.
