> A dating guru who sells love as a system has thirty days to prove it works in public or lose her company, so she coaches her best friend's divorced brother into a viral romance, without telling him that her entire rulebook started in his college notebook.

THE STORY

Bekah Hargan fills theaters with one promise: emotions are a glitch, and her system patches the bug. When investor Herman Kaplan offers $14 million for her company on one condition, a real person falling in love through the system in public within thirty days, she needs a proof case fast.

Her best friend Naomi hands her one: Eli Cohen, a rumpled history teacher and single dad who hasn't dated in two years. He's also the man Bekah has loved since a UCLA library in 2013, and the quiet source of nearly every rule she has ever sold.

As Eli's face goes up on city buses, Bekah's coaching starts working on everyone but her. She overdirects his dates, watches from a parked car, and hands him to her chief rival to secure a deal that requires a named couple on a ballroom stage. When the closing night arrives, she has to choose between fourteen million dollars and the first honest sentence of her life.

WHY NETFLIX, WHY NOW

- A click proposition anyone gets in one frame: the dating expert who cannot date, with a thirty-day clock and a secret.
- A global emotion: the fear of being known versus the comfort of being optimized. It travels anywhere people swipe.
- A timely engine: in an era of viral relationships and soft launches, the film asks who consented to the content.
- Adult romance with real stakes: the leads earn the ending through accountability, not a grand gesture alone.
- Lived-in specificity: Silver Lake, Atwater, the Biltmore, a Shabbat table, and a rare LA rainstorm as a set piece.

THE ARC

Bekah starts as a woman who has made fear profitable and ends as one who can ask out loud first. She loses the app, the office, and most of her staff. She keeps her voice, credits the man who helped shape it, and leaves one crooked shelf exactly as it is.

THREE TRAILER MOMENTS

The drowned earpiece.
Mid-date, Eli pulls out Bekah's earpiece and drops it in his water glass while her tiny voice keeps demanding he compliment the wine.

Fourteen million on fire.
At the Biltmore, Bekah refuses to name the couple, confesses what she hid, and walks off the stage as the conversion clock hits midnight.

One shoe in the rain.
Bekah sprints through a rare LA downpour, finds Eli waiting in her hallway, and hears him ask: Can I come in?

COMPS BY ATTRIBUTE

Hitch: The love expert who can't practice what she sells.

Set It Up: Engineered matchmaking with a professional deadline.

Always Be My Maybe: Old LA history and feelings left unsaid for years.

Nobody Wants This: Warm Jewish family texture and grown-up romance.

PRODUCTION PROFILE

- Contained LA footprint built around a handful of anchor sets: two apartments, an office, a podcast studio, one restaurant.
- Two set pieces: the Wiltern opening and the Biltmore gala.
- One rain sequence. No VFX beyond weather.
- Eight principal roles and one child role.

ROLE	SUGGESTIONS
Bekah Hargan Early 30s. Dating-system founder. Surgical, funny, armored. Needs precise comic timing and a crack you can feel.	• Ayo Edebiri (about 30). Bone-dry precision with real warmth underneath. Makes control funny and makes the crack devastating. Margaret Qualley (about 31). Physical comedy and coiled intensity. Strong for the earpiece and rain sequences. Phoebe Dynevor (about 31). Proven Netflix lead with polish that can believably fill the Wiltern.
Eli Cohen Mid 30s. History teacher, single dad. Rumpled, curious, kind, quietly stubborn.	• Logan Lerman (about 34). Gentle and grounded, right age, and believable with a nine-year-old. Ben Platt (about 33). Verbal, nerdy charm with emotional openness. Owns the Rome monologues. Jeremy Allen White (about 35). Brings weight to the divorce and makes Eli's boundaries land.
Naomi Cohen Early 30s. Pediatric surgeon, Eli's sister, Bekah's best friend. Exhausted, direct, hilarious.	• Beanie Feldstein (about 33). Comic engine with real heart. The intercom scene writes itself. Rachel Sennott (about 30). Sharp, modern, chaotic energy. Strong youth-audience crossover. Alia Shawkat (about 37). Deadpan authority for the wedding-night speech.
Derek Long Late 30s. Podcast co-host and Bekah's conscience. Improv first, plain speech when it counts.	• Brian Tyree Henry (about 44). Warmth and gravity. Makes the couch scene and the stoop scene equally memorable. Kingsley Ben-Adir (about 40). Leading-man presence for the Chloe button. Lakeith Stanfield (about 35). Offbeat rhythm that makes Derek's honesty land sideways.
Chloe Vance Mid 30s. Rival coach. Calm, magnetic, holds boundaries. A real alternative, never a villain.	• Zazie Beetz (about 35). Effortless cool and intelligence. Wins the room at the summit without trying. Teyonah Parris (about 39). Poise and precision for the red-carpet refusal. Simone Ashley (about 31). Netflix-proven romantic lead with global reach.
Herman Kaplan Late 50s. Private equity partner. Charming shark who treats intimacy as inventory.	• Jon Hamm (about 55). Charisma with menace. Makes balloons sound like a threat. Billy Crudup (about 58). Slick, articulate, believable boardroom predator.
Sheryl Hargan Late 50s. Bekah's mother. Painter, romantic, chaotic, more self-aware than she looks.	• Toni Collette (about 54). Heartbreak and comedy in the same breath. Owns the easel scene. Laura Dern (about 59). Big-hearted chaos with dignity. Leslie Mann (about 54). Pure comic warmth for the white-couch sleepover.
Angela Maddow 40s. Bekah's lawyer. Allergic to optimism. Practical support, never sentimental.	• Aubrey Plaza (about 42). Deadpan perfection for the croutons line. Ali Wong (about 44). Razor timing and real authority.
Kayla Mid 20s. Bekah's assistant. Gen Z, loyal, anxious about rent.	• Maitreyi Ramakrishnan (about 25). Netflix-proven comic energy and youth audience pull. Lukita Maxwell (about 26). Natural, quick, believable on a laptop at 2 AM.
Sophie Cohen Age 9. Eli's daughter. Sharp, observant, still a kid.	• Open casting search. National search for ages 8 to 10 who read young on camera. Prioritize natural stillness over polish. Her best scenes are silent: the soccer sideline and the bus.
Featured Roles Alice, Kate, Marcus, GiGi, Tonya, the Kaplan associate.	Strong day-player opportunities. GiGi opens and closes the film, which makes her an ideal cameo for a recognizable comic voice.

CHEMISTRY READS TO TEST

1. Ayo Edebiri and Ben Platt. Comic precision meets verbal warmth. The safest bet for laughs.
2. Margaret Qualley and Jeremy Allen White. More heat and more ache. The rain sequence plays bigger.
3. Phoebe Dynevor and Logan Lerman. Classic Netflix rom-com glow with an easy family feel.
